“Citizenship and Crisis is a timely and important book. Based on a landmark survey of Arab Americans in the Detroit metropolitan area, it looks beyond community-held stereotypes of Arab-Americans to uncover the complex realities of their religious practices, cultural values, political views, and identities and provides a fascinating analysis of the many contradictions involved in being Arab American today. The book is a must-read for anyone interested in understanding Arab Americans in the United States.”

—NANCY FONER, Distinguished Professor of Sociology, Hunter College, and the Graduate Center, City University of New York

“Drawing on exceptionally well-designed survey research on Arab Americans in Detroit and Dearborn, Michigan, the authors of these interdisciplinary articles have collaborated closely, greatly enhancing the significance and impact of their work. Meticulous statistical and ethnographic information informs each piece, and the theoretical focus throughout is on different discourses of citizenship. The chapters all contribute to an extraordinarily compelling and nuanced argument that, for America’s Arab immigrants, their particular and unique history problematizes their attainment of full citizenship in the nation.”

—KAREN E. LEONARD, professor of anthropology, University of California-Irvine

Wayne Baker is professor of management and organizational behavior and the John D. Sparks Whitodel Cooperation Research Professorship in Social Research and holds the John D. Sparks Whitodel Cooperation Research Professorship in Social Research. Sally Howell is assistant professor of history at the University of Michigan-Dearborn. Ananya Jamm is an assistant professor of politics at Princeton University. Ann Criss Liu is associate professor of public policy and political science at the University of Michigan. Andrew Sirovich is Arthur F. Thurnau Professor of Anthropology, University of Michigan. Ronald R. Stolicker is professor of political science at the University of Michigan-Dearborn and was formerly head of the Center for Arab American Studies. Mark Tessler is Senior Research Fellow and Professor of Political Science, Institute at the University of Michigan. He is also a faculty associate at the Institute for Social Research and holds the John D. Sparks Whitodel Cooperation Research Professorship.

“In the most noble tradition of empirically grounded social science, Citizenship and Crisis lifts the veil of misinformation created by post-9/11 anxiety and xenophobia to reveal an Arab American community that is committed to American ideals and to U.S. society and struggling to gain acceptance here—in short, a group that bears little resemblance to the terrorists and fundamentalists haunting American nightmares.”

—RICHARD ALBA, Distinguished Professor of Sociology, The Graduate Center, City University of New York

RUSSELL SAGE FOUNDATION
New York, New York | www.russellsage.org

RUSSELL SAGE FOUNDATION
New York, New York | www.russellsage.org

It is citizenship simply a legal status or does it deserve a sense of belonging to a national community? For Arab Americans, these questions took on new urgency after 9/11, as the collapse of the institutions that had nurtured their community came to a head. Citizenship and Crisis reveals that, despite an ever-shifting definition of citizenship and the uncertainties it can bring, Arab Americans retained a strong sense of who they were and of where they belonged. This book, by a leading team of scholars from the Detroit Arab American Study, which surveyed more than 1,000 Arab Americans, is the focus of this book. Arab Americans express pride in being American at rates higher than the general population. In some small measure, this is true for Arab Americans; it is not for Arab Americans. According to the landmark Detroit Arab American Study, which interviewed more than 1,000 Arab Americans, the focus of this book, Arab Americans express pride in being American at rates higher than the general population. In some small measure, this is true for Arab Americans; it is not for Arab Americans.

According to the landmark Detroit Arab American Study, which interviewed more than 1,000 Arab Americans, the focus of this book, Arab Americans express pride in being American at rates higher than the general population. In some small measure, this is true for Arab Americans; it is not for Arab Americans. It is citizenship simply a legal status or does it deserve a sense of belonging to a national community? For Arab Americans, these questions took on new urgency after 9/11, as the collapse of the institutions that had nurtured their community came to a head. Citizenship and Crisis reveals that, despite an ever-shifting definition of citizenship and the uncertainties it can bring, Arab Americans retained a strong sense of who they were and of where they belonged. This book, by a leading team of scholars from the Detroit Arab American Study, which surveyed more than 1,000 Arab Americans, is the focus of this book. Arab Americans express pride in being American at rates higher than the general population. In some small measure, this is true for Arab Americans; it is not for Arab Americans. According to the landmark Detroit Arab American Study, which interviewed more than 1,000 Arab Americans, the focus of this book, Arab Americans express pride in being American at rates higher than the general population. In some small measure, this is true for Arab Americans; it is not for Arab Americans. According to the landmark Detroit Arab American Study, which interviewed more than 1,000 Arab Americans, the focus of this book, Arab Americans express pride in being American at rates higher than the general population. In some small measure, this is true for Arab Americans; it is not for Arab Americans.